Here is what folks are saying about the exhibit:

"We are excited to bring in this amazing array of creative thinking," said Cori Coffman, executive director of The Eisner. "Design comes in many forms, architecture being one of them. If these concept drawings were built, Milwaukee would have a far more progressive looking skyline."

According to the Shepard Express: "Milwaukee's unseen architecture proves to be interesting... Exhibiting these successful buildings shows that the aesthetic contributions of architecture will advance society's needs for a sustainable and affordable future."
